FRONTIER MEN

What you are going to read first appeared in the year 1888. It is a good and accurate description of people in the Old West. But who wrote it? Let's play a guessing game. Read it and enjoy it. And as you read it, try to figure out who wrote it. In the last line we will tell you the author.

"Cowboys resemble one another much more and outsiders much less than is the case even with their employers, the ranchmen. A town in the cattle country, where for some cause it is thronged with men from the neighborhood, always presents a picturesque sight. On the wooden sidewalks of the broad, dusty streets the men who ply the various industries known only to frontier existence jostle one another as they saunter to and fro or lounge lazily in front of the straggling, cheap-looking board houses. Hunters come in from the plains and the mountains, clad in buckskin shirts and fur caps, greasy and unkempt, but with resolute faces and sullen, watchful eyes, that are ever on the alert. The teamsters, surly and self-contained, wear slouch-hats and great cowhide boots, while the stage-drivers, their faces seamed by the hardship and exposure of their long drives with every kind of team through every kind of country and in every kind of weather, proud of their really wonderful skill as reinsmen and conscious of their high standing in any frontier community, look down on and sneer at the "skin hunters" and the plodding drivers of the white-topped prairie-schooners.

"Besides these there are trappers, and wolfers whose business is to poison wolves, with shaggy-knock-kneed ponies to carry their small bales and bundles of furs—beaver, wolf, fox and occasionally otter, and silent sheep-herders with cast-down faces, never able to forget the absolute solitude and monotony of their dreary lives, nor to rid their minds of the thought of the woolly idiots they pass all their days in tending. Such are the men who have come to town either on business or else to frequent the flaunting saloons and gaudy hells of all kinds. Indians, too, wrapped in blankets with stolid emotionless faces stalk silently around the whites. Or join in the gambling and horse-racing. If the town is on the borders of the mountain country there will also be sneaky lumbermen, rough-looking miners, and packers whose business is to guide the long mule and pony teams that go where wagons cannot. And whose work in packing needs special and peculiar skill. And mingled with and drawn from all these classes are desperadoes of every grade. From the gambler up through the horse-thief to the murderous professional bully. Or, as he is locally called, "bad man" now, however a much less conspicuous object than formerly.

But everywhere among these plainsmen and mountain men, and more important than any, are the cowboys. The men who follow the calling that has brought such towns into being. Singly or in twos or threes, they gallop their wiry little horse down the street. Their lithe supple fingers erect or swaying slightly as they sit loosely in the saddle. While their stirrups are so long that their knees are hardly bent. The bridles not taut enough to keep the chains from clanking. They are smaller and less muscular than the wielders of axe and pick. But they are as hardy and self-reliant as any men who ever breathed. With bronzed, set faces and keen eyes that look all the world straight in the face. Without flinching as they flash out from under the broad-brimmed hats. Peril and hardship and years of long toil broken by weeks of brutal dissipation draw haggard lines across their eager faces. But never dim their reckless eyes nor break their bearing of defiant self-confidence.

"They do not walk well, partly because they so rarely do any work out of the saddle. Partly because their chaparejos or leather overalls hamper them when on the ground. But their appearance is striking for all that. And picturesque, too, with their jingling spurs, the big revolvers stuck in their belts and bright silk handkerchief knotted loosely round their necks over the open collars of the flannel shirts. When drunk on the villainous whiskey of the frontier towns, they cut mad antics, riding their horses into saloons, firing their pistol right and left.

Well, who wrote all of this? It had to be somebody who lived in the West. Correct. He did and later became President of the United States. Theodore Roosevelt.
